Webinar on "Women Elected Representatives in the Local Governments in Kerala: Leaders hit the Political Glass Ceiling organized on 19 January 2023

Prof D Narayana, Former Director, GIFT, presented the paper. Prof KJ Joseph, Director GIFT welcomed the participants. Ms Akihila Pappan, Research Associate , GIFT chaired the session.

Abstract: Women in politics and leadership positions have captured our imagination in recent years. But, globally, continued underrepresentation of women in politics is the rule. By the end of 2021, only 26.1 per cent women are members of parliament globally. And the variation is wide across the countries. One of the key determinants of women's representation is gender quotas. India has, for close to thirty years now, implemented quota for women in the Local Governments. Has it made a difference to the rise of women leaders is a topic hardly discussed in India. Rise of women to the top of the political spectrum as leaders is incumbent on the number, pathways, and political clout (Jalalzai, 2014). Many states have raised the quotas to 50 per cent. The large numbers, however, have to be embellished by the supporting capabilities of women, especially gender parity in education and employment. In the absence of these two, the widespread phenomenon of 'proxies' may exist - someone else taking decisions for those elected women. As regards pathways to leadership, the political pipeline shapes women's chances of rising to the top. Political parties are considered as the "gatekeepers" of democracy. How the political parties function and how their functions are regulated have a significant impact on opportunities for women's political advancement. Kerala is well-known for its human development achievements, and decentralised model of governance. It stands in the forefront of implementing 50 per cent quota for women and has a competitive political environment with multiple parties actively fighting for power. The issue of women elected leaders in the Local Governments of Kerala has not attracted much attention. Especially the role of political parties as gatekeepers, and how their functioning has affected women's political advancement. This paper focuses on this issue. The paper begins by setting out the facets of gender parity in education and employment in Kerala to keep the issue of proxy out of the way. Then it turns to the numbers, pathways and political clout. Numbers in both rural and urban Local Governments, women's share and Party positions are discussed in detail. Political pathway is analysed by taking the proportion of women members getting re-elected. It is contrasted with the political parties retaining proportion of seats in Local Governments. Data for the three Local Government elections - 2010, 2015, and 2020 - are used for the purpose. Women's representation in political party committees is, then taken up followed by a discussion of representation in Legislative Assembly and the pathways to it. The paper concludes that the patriarchal mores in the society and within the political parties of all hues is responsible for the lack of political advancement of women to leadership positions in Kerala. If Kerala with high gender parity in education and work participation rates shows such low advancement of women, then why talk of other states and India as a whole? India is paying a heavy price in terms of poor human development achievements by underrepresenting women in politics and legislative institutions. The way forward is too evident.
